1922

"The Glory of the House is Hospitality"

Eda Lord Murphy
Iowa State College

Follow this and additional works at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/homemaker

Part of the Home Economics Commons

Recommended Citation
Murphy, Eda Lord (1922) ""The Glory of the House is Hospitality"," The Iowa Homemaker: Vol. 2 : No. 7 , Article 6.
Available at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/homemaker/vol2/iss7/6

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Student Publications at Iowa State University Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Homemaker by an authorized editor of Iowa State University Digital Repository. For more information, please contact digirep@iastate.edu.
Indian Summer—The Season for Picnics

By ESTHER RAYBURN

INDIAN SUMMER is here, with its soft warm weather, its haze and its picnic atmosphere! For Indian Summer is the time of all times for picnics. There are picnics and picnics, ordinary and extraordinary, and they are all fun, but those which linger longest in the memory of most people are the good old wiener roasts held just in the height of Indian Summer.

If you are a picnic devotee, this is just a confirmation of your own ideas, but if you have never in all your life attended a wiener roast in Indian Summer, then don't hesitate longer, but gather together a group of fun-loving people and go to the nearest woods, glorious with frost-nipped leaves.

The fun of this kind of picnic is that absolutely no preparation is necessary. Just before starting time, go to the meat market and insist on the largest, fattest wiener in the shop, as well as the juiciest of dill pickles. These are most essential. If you like mustard, have a small jar wrapped with the clothes and wiener. Condensation is very necessary to eliminate the usual "thousands" of bundles for the ordinary picnic.

No one ever thought of a wiener without at least one bit better than any other kind of fire, but just because a cone-shaped fire gives such a cozy, campy atmosphere.

Each member of the party must be provided with a long green stick for roasting wiener and forasting marshmallows. The stick is very essential, but neither a moat nor a fork is allowed on this picnic, for who wants a wiener other than brown, juicy and dripping on the end of a stick? At first the smoke curls back and forth from side to side and out among the party. This is because it is necessary for everyone to be thoroughly saturated with the woodsy, smoky smell of the campfire. At last, when the fire dies down and only the coals are left, toast the fluffy marshmallows until they are a real golden brown, and then don't by any means leave until you have spent a few minutes gazing dreamily into the fire. Those last few moments give the final atmosphere to an Indian Summer picnic.

The beauty of the house is order;
The blessing of the house is contentment;
The glory of the house is hospitality;
The crown of the house is godliness.

There are four themes in the lines of this quatrain, and each has an inspiration all its own, but the third detaches itself most easily as a special phase of homemaking.

The claims of one's indebtedness socially are quite different from the claims of hospitality. One may entertain elaborately and constantly, and still not be known as a hospitable person. There is a wealth of abstract meaning in the phrase, the expression involves very concrete things: What it may be shown is the finest in a home where there isn't much money, for the willingness to share and the actual sharing are the glories of that home.

If there is a wealth of abstract meaning in the phrase, the expression involves very concrete things; what it may be shown is the finest in a home where there isn't much money, for the willingness to share and the actual sharing are the glories of that home. If there is great wealth, hospitality may include all the extra pleasures which money can add to comfort. But these things must be glorified by an indefinable something before they add one bit to the sense of hospitality.

The gentle art of making people feel at ease is a beautiful gift not granted to everyone, the one which may, to a certain extent, be cultivated. Its best teacher is the habit of putting oneself in the place of the guest, and treating him as one would like to be treated.

There are varying ideas prevalent about what constitutes genuine hospitality. At one extreme is the woman who expects her own family to wire the exact date and hour of their arrival, so that she can be "ready" for them. At the other extreme is the person who "keeps open house" all the time. In between are the multitude of emergencies which we are forced to meet every day.

Of course, it is the height of successful housekeeping to have the wheels running so smoothly that they are noiseless. The arrival of guests, even unexpected one, in this household, may accelerate the machinery, but does not put it out of order.

She is a person to envy and admire. Whose manner never betrays the fact that she must make six chows do the work of eight! In any event, the matter of food must not be considered paramount. It is acute torture to realize that the dinner planned for your pleasure has become a burden to the hostess.

It has always been a mystery how some housekeepers are never caught off their guard. An avalanche of friends or relatives may come unannounced, but there will be in many an Iowa home a full course served up with the delight and a warm welcome. (Anyone will admit that the knowledge of plenty of food in the pantry will broaden the smile.)

There is nothing so depressing for the guest as to overhear family discussions, or to know that she, in her innocence, has become the proverbial monkey-wrench. If any member of the family is given to mild brainstorm over the trivial matter of a guest, there should be a padded and insulated closet where sounds are muffled!

Suppose the guest has the misfortune to be unpopular with all except one member of the family. Then family pride and "exquit de corps" must come to the rescue.

Perhaps the greatest honor that a guest can experience is the feeling of being taken into the family circle just as it is. To feel that the family customs are not changed and that the individuals are not overriding their attempt at good behavior, is a genuine compliment.

In one family of six sons and six daughters, it was the custom to try to settle disputes at the table, so the mother was never mortified by the sight of family skeletons unexpectedly dragged out during meals. It was the sort of a home where each one felt free to bring a friend, knowing that a genuine welcome would be given. As a result, there are countless young people who have felt the benign influence of that family life, and who remember with deepest gratitude and affection the weekends spent there.

Do you who have happy homes think about sharing them with others? Some have found that through open hospitality they have entertained angels unawares.

There was a home once set in a rough pioneer town. It was humble and plain and "poverty poor." It was presided over by a clergyman and his wife. Summer tourists, men on fishing trips, and all manner of strangers have accepted the hospitality so freely offered there. With what surprise and delight they have discovered, perhaps for the first time in their lives, that the true philosophy of hospitality is the habit of putting oneself in the place of others, and treating him as one would like to be treated.

No greater compliment can be paid a father and mother than that the young friends of the family love to visit them. It is a sign that the machinery runs smoothly and that there is no lack of hospitality. That the enthusiasm and extravagances of youth are viewed with tolerance and patience; that the high hopes and ambitions, as well as the disappointments of the hour, can be discussed with frankness and candor. It means, in fact, that there is no end to the influence which a truly hospitable family can have in a community. Seeds are planted which bear beautiful fruits many years later.

Yes, the beauty of the house is order, the blessing of the house is contentment, but the heart which makes the home radiant and shining and full of glory is hospitality.