Let's Play Dolls
by Betty Gaylord

I F YOU were an average little girl you liked to dress and play with dolls, but have you ever thought of dressing them to sell commercially?

Mrs. C. P. Winsor of Boston, who visited the campus with her husband recently, makes tiny clothes for fifteen-inch dolls as a hobby and sells them at a considerable profit—buying the dolls at $10 and selling them, completely outfitted, at $35.

"By profession I am a biologist," Mrs. Winsor said, and dressing dolls is just a hobby which I started last November, but for anyone who can create a market it should have a definite commercial value, too. Many large department stores and doll manufacturers with wealthy clientele would be glad to pay well for the material and time spent in dressing dolls. It should offer many opportunities for the married home economics trained woman who likes to sew and who has dress designing ability.

The dolls Mrs. Winsor dresses are modeled after real children, with real hair which can be combed and arranged in interesting coiffures. Many wealthy parents have their children modeled into life-size dolls by a sculptress who charges one hundred dollars a model.

Around Christmas Mrs. Winsor made complete layettes for baby dolls. She outfitted one little doll with a blue sailor jacket, complete with brass buttons and chevrons. From little bloomers that button onto little pantie waists, Mrs. Winsor's outfits are complete to sleeping pajamas, leather shoes and even little knitted socks and mittens which have six stitches around each thumb.

One doll had blonde hair, braided in the back and tied with plaid ribbons. It was dressed in a natty white blouse whose collar peeked through the neck of a hand-knit rust colored cashmere sweater with raglan sleeves, a beige pleated skirt and short hand-knit socks of rust and beige matched the ensemble.

Now let's play dolls!

A recent publication, "The Home Medicine Cabinet," under the supervision of the Consumers' Project, is provoking considerable comment. Listing effective and safe remedies which should be included in the home medicine cabinet to meet emergencies, it discusses their selection, use and care. Some industries were relieved to note recommendation of simple prescription remedies, compounded from standard pharmaceuticals, rather than the commercial names of recommended and disapproved medicines, gargles and mouth-washes. The bulletin observes that one of the leading proprietary antiseptics is largely ineffective and that one of the most popular headache remedies contains acetanilid, which is likely to cause ill effects. Ten thousand copies of this bulletin are available from the Consumers' Project, United States Department of Labor, for free distribution.

As it coasted down the sky—
It will be smaller tomorrow night—
It left a sliver in your eye!
