1943

Iowa State Men Describe Food In South Pacific

Gertrud Ortgies

Iowa State College

Follow this and additional works at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/homemaker

Part of the Home Economics Commons

Recommended Citation

Ortgies, Gertrud (1943) "Iowa State Men Describe Food In South Pacific," The Iowa Homemaker: Vol. 23 : No. 14 , Article 4.
Available at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/homemaker/vol23/iss14/4

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Student Publications at Iowa State University Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Homemaker by an authorized editor of Iowa State University Digital Repository. For more information, please contact digirep@iastate.edu.
STUDENTS from Iowa State who have returned from fighting in other parts of the world give enlightening accounts of the unusual foods which comprised their daily diet.

Gerald Rabourn, recently discharged from the United States Coast Guard Reserve, recounts some experiences while in the Virgin Islands.

"The town, Charlotte Amalie, on St. Thomas Island, where I was stationed, is inhabited mostly by natives who speak English. The people are lazy, their principal occupation being fishing. The native women carry everything on their heads.

"All the water used in the Virgin Islands is caught from the rooftops into reservoirs. There are no wells. They use shutters instead of windows because the frequent hurricanes would shatter the glass. Though the humidity is high and the temperature ranges from 60 in winter to 100 in summer, the trade winds keep it cool and comfortable.

There are few restaurants in Charlotte Amalie. The food is expensive and not palatable. The average meal costs a dollar and consists of a main dish which is a mixture of rice, potatoes and meat, and a salad of chopped greens. They serve a light bread which is baked in long loaves. The dessert is usually cake made from fine imported flours and the beverage is coffee or pepsi-cola. They eat 'palm cabbage' which grows in the top of a palm tree. It looks and tastes like artichokes or brussel sprouts and is eaten either raw or cooked.

"There are few restaurants in Charlotte Amalie. The food is expensive and not palatable. The average meal costs a dollar and consists of a main dish which is a mixture of rice, potatoes and meat, and a salad of chopped greens. They serve a light bread which is baked in long loaves. The dessert is usually cake made from fine imported flours and the beverage is coffee or pepsi-cola. They eat 'palm cabbage' which grows in the top of a palm tree. It looks and tastes like artichokes or brussel sprouts and is eaten either raw or cooked.

"In Samoa the inhabitants make tortillas out of the flour and use a coconut paste for butter. They eat pork and drink goat's milk. Many root vegetables and tropical fruits, including tangerines, lemons and pineapples are grown on the island.

"We found papayas and avocados in the New Hebrides and the Fiji Islands. The papayas have a bright orange flesh and are sweet. The avocados are 6 or 8 inches long and 5 inches in diameter.

"There are many gardens on the islands because the soil is good. The inhabitants specialize in root vegetables because it is too hot to grow them above the ground. I didn't see any bread, but they used tapioca made from the poisonous cassava root.

"Saipan, Guam and Tinian had lots of rice and green vegetables grew wild. Papayas, avocados and pineapples are abundant on these islands.

"We sleep in sand, eat sand and wear sand," writes Captain Lee Bagby, from Sharjah, Trucial Oman, Arabia. "We have excellent food—most of which comes from the States. Tonight we had chicken, Idaho potatoes, peas, fresh bread and butter, ice cream and fruit jello. In a hot place like this good food does more for morale than anything in the world."