Students sound off about 2012 election as campaigning ends
By Thelusma Mast

This year’s presidential election is likely to be the only one students will experience while at Iowa State. “This is probably one of the most polarizing elections in our country that could push America forward.”

They agree, however, that political advertisements are disliked by many who are dissatisfied with the path that Obama has done. “I’m not sure if people trust Romney but there are still divided feelings about the job that Obama has done.”

“It’s a very interesting election,” Taylor Smith, freshman in pre-engineering, said. “There’s a lot of issues concerning gender and the freedom to vote.”

Taylor Smith, freshman in pre-engineering, has a different reason for why she is interested in the election. “I think having the opportunity to have a new president of our country that could push America forward.”

She says knowing that political advertisements are disliked throughout the election. “I tend to ignore [ads] because I don’t have much of a plan. I look at what is right and what is false and people trying to sway opinion.”

Polling locations
All those eligible to vote must do so at their designated polling locations. A voter will not be able to vote just anywhere in Story County. An individual must vote at the polling place designated on their voter registration card. Once this correct precinct is provided to the voter, they will be taken to the correct polling location finder by a poll worker at the polling place prior to casting their vote for the issue of residency.

Faces in the Crowd
How do you think this election compares to the one in 2008?

College students write themselves into society’s forays of activities between classes and studying. For Christopher Jacobs, writing allows him to escape the frustrations and daily events.

Jacobs, senior in chemical engineering, wrote his first novel “Champion Falling” during his freshman year at Iowa State. The book borrows from Greek mythology and is the first in a trilogy.

Cancellation of the New York Marathon was wrong

By Isaac Hunt

There were a number of invo- ments to the running of the New York City Marathon last year, but none more so than the decision to cancel the race due to Hurricane Sandy. The decision was met with widespread criticism from runners, and it was widely viewed as a public relations disaster for the city.

But a closer examination of the race shows that the decision was actually a wise one. The race was postponed until October, which was a better time for runners, and it also helped to get the city back on its feet.

When Mayor Michael Bloomberg announced the news on the 26.2-mile race was to move forward as planned, runners were elated. But the mayor made a mistake in thinking that the race could go forward without a hitch. The race was canceled after Hurricane Sandy hit the area, and the decision was met with widespread praise from runners.

The mayor's decision was based on the fact that the race was going to be held in a part of the city that was not affected by the hurricane. The Main Street Cultural District has developed the East End Gateway Project, which wishes to make downtown Ames more beautiful, such as by artistically painting its benches.

The Main Street Cultural District has started a three-phase construction project to help make the area become more green.

"Currently in the second phase of the East End Gateway Project, an arch is being built above the 100 block of Main Street. The Main Street Cultural District has taken over the project and will hopefully carry it to completion." said Tom Drenthe, president of the Cultural District.

"The East End Gateway project began a year and a half ago, consisting of three phases separately.

"The planning of an evergreen tree in 2011 began the first phase of making the area more green."

By including new plants to place and plants on Main Street, the plan is to make the downtown area become more beautiful.

"The second phase, the building of the arch, is currently being measured. We want and asked the stakeholders and the public to submit feedback on the arch and pick a design. We then went back, asked those people to submit their ideas to make them better. The final arch included Country Landscapes ultimately created the design for our clients."

"The third phase will be placing sculptures in an area that Drenthe described as currently having "scarily trees." The Cultural District is working with the Public Art Commission, a government commission, on the design.

In raising money for the project, the Cultural District has been hosting fundraisers such as the Oktoberfest Celebration. Funds come in through individual donors, and the project is being enacted.

As the MSCD continues, the next step is to see if the chosen area for the arch can actually support an arch. Drenthe hopes for the arch to be finished in three years.

"The Downtown Sit-Down chairs have to do with the benches getting painted," said Malone. The Main Street Cultural District is basically getting those benches and those funds go to downtown beautification and could be used on the project as well.
