On track of Iowa State’s campus, it is sometimes mentioned that students could print a lot without a laptop due to the abundance of computer labs available on campus. Amanda Blanco, senior in public relations, would like to make an announcement to that statement after going without a laptop due to a virus that crashed her computer.

“Computer labs are helpful for shorter assignments and printing but only in addition to laptops,” Blanco said. “I finally think anyone could do four poems without a personal computer versus working on a computer.”

Blanco’s computer downloaded malware that caused her to lose access to her hard drive. “I found the person who had a copy of the assignment I needed and got it via email in my ISU account from them,” Blanco said.

She immediately borrowed a computer from her friend and went through to change all her passwords. “While reinstalling programs into her computer, she had other horizon computer problems from friends or worked on computers on campus,” Blanco said. “The whole thing has been a huge pain,” Blanco said.

According to the IT page [http://www.it.iastate.edu/] there are more than 50 computer labs available for student use. However, sometimes student schedules do not allow for ample work time.

Eden Mattias Velazquez, senior in computer engineering, went without a laptop during the spring semester of last year.

“The computer engineering program is a lot of group projects, and sometimes the labs don’t have the newest software that I need,” Velazquez said.

To make Issu, Velazquez managed to connect his gaming desktop as a feasible substitute for his personal computer to be able to get work done at home. However, this comes with its own set of frustrations.

“I know that there’s the perception of the desktop, it is sometimes hard to procrastinate,” Velazquez said.

Iowa State captures first conference win in almost three years.

‘Freshman things’

As a true freshman, ISU coach Kevin Jackson said John Meeks would typicaiy “Freshman things” much as he taught the fresh-some from time to time.

While Cylburn — who is 6-foot-7 — is a beginner to the sport of wrestling, he is also a newcomer playing in his first season. He recently got here, those guys were juniors, and 2011 and sitting out last season. On Monday, he was named the conference’s Rookie of the Week for a second straight week.

The season guard doesn’t fit the bill, either. Clyburn is 10 years old, he has three collegiate seasons under his belt, and has a 2-4, 10-3 record against the Jayhawks.

Iowa State’s guard has had a better late-career, where he was able to control his keys, “Jackson joked.

Students in the College of Business have been presented with an opportunity to follow along through Target Corp.'s supply chain. The tour will primarily take place during spring break.

Supply Chain Management 428 is a course which covers specialized topics. This semester, the course is taught by Scott Grawe, assistant professor in supply chain and information systems. Grawe once worked for Target as well, managing domestic international logistics.

“I asked Target, ‘Can we design something where we take students backwards through the supply chain?’ Target is not doing a lot with it other than the fact that we’re looking at their supply chain and they’re going to help give us access to the ports, to the suppliers, to the stores, the distribution center,” Grawe said.

Students will visit a regular retail location in Ames, then a Target distribution center in Cedar Falls, Iowa.

“This class is basically only taught during spring break with the few days on either side of it,” Grawe said.

During spring break, students will travel to California to visit Port Long Beach, then fly to China.

“The students will get to see how the supply chain works, from the supplier in China, to the port, then to the distribution center and then to the stores,” Grawe said.

Target is also providing a learning opportunity by bringing forth two live cases to the students for them to solve.

“Towards end of February, a team from Target is going to come in and say, ‘Here’s what our supply chain looks like and talk a little bit about the company.’ Then, they are going to kick off what they call a ‘live case,’” Grawe said.

Grawe thinks the real life business situations will be a great experience for students.

“They are going to give us two business problems that they would normally assign to an analyst. Then we have to solve these business problems,” Grawe said.

Lori Escher, senior in supply chain management, is one of the 27 students attending the trip.

“I’m really excited about it,” Escher said. “It’s definitely a great opportunity to network with a large corporation like Target and a great opportunity to see what we’ve learned in class and apply it to the industry.”

Once the students return, they will then convene and talk about their plans for the live cases. These live cases include the two business problems Target brought forth for the trip.

“We have about two weeks to gather our thoughts and get our presentations ready and go up to the headquarters in Minneapolis,” Escher said. “We will work in groups of three or four.”

In Minneapolis, students will present their findings and presentations to senior management.

“If Target likes the presentation created by the students, they will use their plans to solve the live cases,” Grawe said.

“In terms of what’s in it for Target, it’s a great opportunity for [Iowa State] to get students in front of [Target]. They can evaluate and see the type of strong students we have to offer. It helps with our recruiting opportunity for them as well,” Grawe said.
