Hurricane Sandy hit the East Coast on Monday, with New York City being suspended due to the hurricane, flights from and to New York City being suspended as well. It is estimated that more than 100 private planes were involved in the take-off and landing operations.

In addition to flights to and from New York City, train services, air travel, and subway services were suspended. However, the damage caused close to $1 million in damage to the Metropolitan Amtrak, which has been closed since last week. The damage is expected to last several weeks.

Campus green spaces meant to be enjoyed

Recently, there was a public display of anger at Iowa State students from cutting corners between sidewalks, cutting across green spaces and forming foothills for paths that has been dubbed “cow paths.”

Together with all seeming to have a little dirt path woven into the many lanes around campus, these little brown grooves through the pretty green, packed down hard as a rule by the hundreds and thousands of feet trampl ing over the same square footage.

This is nothing new. University ad ministrators and even some students have been griping about cow paths for years — a search of our opinion archives results in stories about the problem dating back many decades. So why all the fuss? Cow paths are a natural tendency in action. They are the people’s expression of having found a better way to do something. In the case of paths, an end result or change out, the paths result is being constantly visible. In the case of paths, the result is being constantly visible.
