Editorially
THIS ISSUE is the last for the other members of the staff. They are to be complimented upon the work that they have done, and thanked for the effort they have expended to make this magazine what it is. It is hoped, that as a result of their efforts, some benefit has accrued to the profession.

THE VETERINARY STUDENT, now in its fourth year of publication, is seeking a place in veterinary journalism. In the first three years of its existence, the editorial policies of the magazine were directed by W. D. Daugherty, E. C. Cedarleaf, and A. M. Orum. Those were the formative years for the publication and we hope that today it embodies, at least in part, some of the ideals, policies and ideas formulated during those years.

But, to secure a place in veterinary journalism The Veterinary Student must have some contribution to make, and we feel that this non-profit publication has a contribution.

Working on the magazine the student realizes the value of current veterinary literature as an aid to his work. He realizes the difficulties that beset the publishers of such literature. He learns the technics necessary for a competent potential contributor to that literature.

The profession is served by the material presented, material by authorities in the profession, by men in related fields who have information that the veterinarian should be using, from case histories, and abstracted from the less widely circulated current literature. The profession is also served by our efforts to promote a cooperative relationship with related sciences and industries.

The magazine also acts as a medium for the publication of alumni news and strives to promote the interests of the Division of Veterinary Medicine of Iowa State College.

OUR COVER for this issue depicts the surgeon administering the anesthetic into the eyelid of a horse. We believe that the shrouded area, the rubber gloves, the obvious asepsis point the way that every practicing veterinarian and every student of Veterinary Medicine should go.
