April 2005

Ask Coco Moore

Ethos Magazine

Follow this and additional works at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/ethos

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/ethos/vol2005/iss3/4

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Student Publications at Iowa State University Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Ethos by an authorized editor of Iowa State University Digital Repository. For more information, please contact digirep@iastate.edu.
Q: After I climax from oral sex, my girlfriend spits. I would really love her to try swallowing, but how do I go about getting her to do it?

Pete, Sophomore

A: Why are you never satisfied, Pete?

For most guys, it's what she does to make it happen, not what happens after the fact. You've already reached your climax—how is her swallowing going to make the blowjob any better? It won't.

But since you seem so hung up on her downing your man juice, I'll fill you in. Before you can convince her to do it, you'll have to understand what's causing her to spit it out. My best guess is that it's because semen tastes yucky. Despite what you may think, semen is not pleasing to the palate. If it were, sophisticates would serve it in wine glasses, along with small cubes of cheese.

If it is indeed the taste that's keeping her from slurping your sludge, try changing your diet. Some experts believe a link exists between what you eat and what your body fluids taste like. Alice at askalice.com says that onions and garlic will leave your girlfriend, and yourself, with a bad taste in the mouth. So will dairy products, broccoli, cauliflower, and asparagus. As if we need another excuse to not eat asparagus. On the other hand, experts say a diet rich in fruit, and even high-quality alcohol (No, not Budweiser Select), can give your semen a sugary flavor.

The simplest (and lamest) answer, the one that all the experts will tell you, is that communication is paramount to any sexual relationship. Unfortunately, telling your partner that you enjoy something others may find disgusting can be a daunting task. However, if you don't talk about it, she'll never know the value you place on swallowing, no matter how many not-so-subtle hints you may give her. Pinching her nose shut while you cover her mouth is not the best way to get the message across.

Make your feelings known. "Perhaps your interest for her to give it a try will be enough for her to try it, especially if she knows how pleased it would make you," says human sexuality instructor Bob Hensley. So sit her down, look her in the eyes, and tell her just... how much you enjoy watching her swallow. You never know—maybe she's just been waiting for you to bring it up and will eagerly comply.

Or she will adamantly refuse, call you gross, and things will forever be awkward between the two of you.

You just never can tell with these things.

Q: I like it when my boyfriend lightly bites me during foreplay and sex, and I find myself being more and more turned on by things like that. I am curious about S&M, but how do I find out about it without people thinking I'm weird?

Sarah, Junior

A: Chances are, especially if you're reading this magazine, people already think you're pretty weird. So sliding into some leather chaps and whipping your boyfriend's ass while he puts clothespins on your nipples won't make much difference.

Your curiosity about S&M is completely natural. Who isn't at least a little interested in knowing what it feels like to be tied up and have your genitals shocked with a car battery?

Oh, not you? If a some light spanking and nibbling are more your thing, there is always Cuffs. Our loveable (and heatable) campus sadists and masochists provide students with information about S&M and how to practice it safely.

And in case you didn't know, they've developed this really cool thing that lets information travel through the air so you can read about all kinds of stuff. It's called the Internet. There are hundreds, if not thousands, of sites dedicated S&M.

But before you invest in a set of handcuffs and a black patent leather car suit, you might want to check with your boyfriend to see what he's into. If he's already nibbling your neck during intercourse, and you're into it, there's no harm. But one partner should never feel uncomfortable. When it comes to S&M, as well as anything else in sex or life, know your limits. If you're having trouble finding them, stop by the ethos office. And bring your whip.

Q: Last time I had sex, this terrible fart noise came from my vagina! What the hell was it and how do I keep it from happening again?

Michelle, Junior

A: Welcome to the world of embarrassment things that can happen to you while having sex. They range from parents walking in on you, to climaxing too early, to waking up next to your cousin after a long night of drinking at a family reunion. Sex in and of itself is inherently embarrassing. Think about it: two people, naked, making strange noises as they mindlessly copulate. All in a frantic attempt to exchange bodily fluids.

Throw in a fart noise or two, and it all becomes too much for the human mind to withstand. But just as climaxing too early, getting interrupted by your parents, or waking up next to your cousin after a long night of drinking at a family reunion are all normal things associated with sex, is what happened to you. It's called a queef.

To help clarify, human sexuality instructor Bob Hensley directs us to urban dictionary.com, which states "(A queef is) an expulsion of air from a vagina after sexual intercourse, usually very fast-paced or deep intercourse."

So if you don't want it to happen again, you'd better forget about ever having any more fast, deep, satisfying sex. Or you could just get over this embarrassment. After all, why worry about another queef when, at any moment, he could notice your left nipple is misshapen?

Q: How do you give a girl the best orgasm?

Shawn, Senior

A: Most guys probably think they already know the answer to this question, but if it involves any move you refer to as the "Jackhammer," you may want to read on. Contrary to popular (male) belief, two and a half minutes of violent, spasmodic, jerky thrusting doesn't do the trick for most women.

The difference between giving her an orgasm that feels like a nuclear explosion instead of a fizzling sparkler lies in the setup and the techniques you use.

Above all, Shawn, she must be in a sensual mood. And her sensual mood isn't the same as yours. It will take a bit more than a slight breeze or a glimpse of a lingerie ad in the newspaper classifieds to get her engines running. Women are a fickle bunch, so following these directions exactly is essential. First, buy several hundred tiny candles, preferably delicately scented, and arrange them all over the room you'll be using. Next, obtain thousands of flower petals, either from a flower shop or neighbor's garden. Spread these around the room too. You'll also have to make a trip to buy some sensitive music, because, trust me, she's not interested in making sweet, passionate love to anything you might already have in your CD collection. Also stock up on a variety of scented oils and creams. As a nice final touch, buy some new bed sheets with a high thread count. Because, as anyone will tell you, thread count and orgasm quality are in direct proportion.

But your work doesn't stop here. Once you've created your sensual oasis, you have to know what moves to make. While the order can vary, it's always a good bet to incorporate most of the following: delicate touches, sweet nothings whispered into her ear, deep, meaningful glances, gentle kisses on her neck, scented oils rubbed over her body, and cuddling. The combination of her sensual mood and these little tricks should bring her to the brink of ecstasy. And now, gentlemen, is the time for the Jackhammer.

Q: I am a girl and I can't orgasm. Any tips?

Katie, Freshman

A: Contact Shawn, or any other guy who read the orgasm question above, to experience the thrill that is the Jackhammer.

to submit your kinky sex questions, visit us at www.ethosmagazine.com