It’s 2 a.m., you’re a college student, a little intoxicated, just got home and you’re starving. You obviously don’t have any money to order cheese balls and a pound of wings from Pizza Pit. Yeah. We’ve all been there. Desperate for food—so desperate we’d shovel just about anything into our bodies to cure the hunger.

It’s depressing to think about some of the things we’ve actually managed to eat when we’re inebriated and absolutely famished. Not only depressing but even embarrassing at times. That’s why most of the people in this article would like to remain unnamed. Can you imagine how you’d feel if everyone found out that you ate a whole can of Eazy Cheese last Friday night?

Some of these food concoctions are beyond repulsive. It’s hard to imagine these people had the courage to actually take a bite or two. But that’s what makes it desperate, right?

“This isn’t even gross. I would totally eat this sober, but a lot of the times I eat Takis dipped in sour cream.”

“Back when I was at my old school, I would come home after a night of drinking and grab a cheese stick, deli meat and salsa from the fridge. I’d wrap the deli meat around the cheese stick and just dip it in the salsa. Those were my go-to drunchies.”

“Me and my friends had one of those pre-made pizzas you buy from Hy-Vee, kind of like Papa Murphy’s. I was in charge of cooking the pizza, so I preheated the oven and put the pizza in. About five minutes later, I took it out. I guess I just couldn’t wait until the pizza was cooked to start eating it. Gist of the story, I made everyone eat a completely raw pizza—dough and everything.”

“I’ve definitely eaten a whole packet of ramen raw because I was too lazy to microwave it. It doesn’t help that I was completely sober when I made that decision.”

“The worst concoction I’ve ever made had to be when I put jalapeños, cream cheese and strawberry jam all together. I was trying to make something similar to the jalapeño poppers from West Town Pub.”

“I have no idea why, but I once mixed a can of baked beans and a can of chicken noodle soup together.”

“After a night filled with heavy drinking, I came home to two things in my fridge—mustard and pickles. I found some bread in my pantry that I’m pretty sure expired the week before and made a mustard and pickle sandwich. I honestly don’t remember it being that bad.”

BE THE PERSON WHO…

- is a vegan pusher
- is a library preacher
- Snapchats excessively
- tries to use Google Plus
- tries to teach the teacher
- asks “did you get my text?”
- says abbreviations out loud
- packs up way before class is over
- always quotes vines or viral videos
- gets day drunk and makes your friends take care of you
- still sends Farmville requests on Facebook
- loudly talks about “how easy” a test was
- complains about a 100-level class
