The Psychology of Clothing

Eveleth Pedersen

Iowa State College

Follow this and additional works at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/homemaker

Part of the Home Economics Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/homemaker/vol3/iss12/11

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Student Publications at Iowa State University Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Homemaker by an authorized editor of Iowa State University Digital Repository. For more information, please contact digirep@iastate.edu.
"Something new," says Madam Fashion, and we all turn eager ears. This time it is science telling us that "something new" has been found about our modes of dress.

At the very beginning, one finds that the psychology of clothing is closely linked with the study of physiology. It is physiology that gives us many of the reasons for clothes, beginning with that of privacy or modesty. Man is naturally a naked animal. In clothing our bodies, it behooves us to respect and not ignore this natural nakedness. Closely related to this reason is the wearing of clothes because of a desire to be attractive. The age-old question of whether women dress to please men or not might logically enter here, but when great psychologists have been unable to answer that question satisfactorily, perhaps we had better pass on.

Should we be lacking in modesty, or even in a desire to be attractive, we should still need clothes to protect us from the elements. We are warm-blooded animals, and the garments we wear directly affect our ability to maintain the proper body temperature. Their texture, whether a loose or a tight weave, determine the rate lost from the surface of the body. The material of which they are made, again, has its effect. Fur keeps us warmer than does wool; wool is warmer than silk, silk than cotton, cotton than linen, and finally the color itself has an actual influence on our body temperature. White tends to make the wearer feel cool, black gives warmth, red excites and so warms.

"The clothes proclaim the man; a cheap coat makes a cheap man," however, give us our most real reason for wearing clothes. They alloy one kind of a fear with another. We are afraid of being considered immodest, of showing signs of poverty, of looking ridiculous, of being considered horrid by the esteem of those about us.

We have come to believe that life is a reaction of the individual to his environment. In this reaction clothes play an important part. They have almost literally become a second skin. As such they are as closely related to the mind as they are to the body. Because we are more familiar to their relation to the body, let us consider that as a basis for a subsequent consideration of the influences of clothes on the mind.

Their proximity to the skin leads us to call to mind four of the functions of the skin which clothing may affect. These are: protection, regulation of body temperature, sensations of various kinds, and excretions of sweat. The skin must be allowed to breathe as well as the lungs. If it cannot breathe, but if moving air can also have its harmful effects. The increase in well-being and efficiency is remarkable. Can you not remember how refreshing some cool, brisk breeze was on a sultry July day? A slight circulation of the air next to the body at any time has this same effect. Clothes that protect the body sufficiently may at the same time be of loose enough construction or loose enough weave to permit this moving of the air.

Above all, our clothes must permit our bodies to function normally and comfortably. The regulation of breathing movements, heart and arterial action are essential to life. Needless and confining clothing is not only fatiguing, but often causes such a sense of confinement that we have been too tired to carry our heavy winter coat any longer, and find yourself forced to sit down and rest before evening. These are the kinds of things that go to complete our life may and do have a direct relation to the way our clothes should be made. Whether a man be a philosopher or a street cleaner, he needs clothes that fit his body and his body's set of actions—he cannot afford to have either of them cramped or hidden by his clothes.

We have long recognized this underlying principle in wearing old clothes for work. We are most comfortable in clothes that fit them so well that they have given here and wrinkled there so that they have come to really fit.

"This perfect fitting of our clothes to our bodies and our personalities is the first step in the securing of empathy. Empathy has been spoken of as a feeling of equable delight—that feeling an expert dancer or skater gives when dancing or skating beautifully. In the personal as well as in the social consciousness, unpleasant experiences actually are more vividly real and more memorable than pleasant ones. Moreover, psychologists tell us that they get as strong reactions in their laboratories by having their subjects experience pleasant or unpleasant things as they do from the real experiences. Such being the case, how a person feels in his clothes will determine what impact he looks to them is far more important than whatever the true cases may be. A cheap coat does not always make a cheap man, for if he is dressed just right—he looks like a million," the effect on his mental condition is just the same as if he actually were dressed in the best of style. He is happy. Being happy, he expends more energy, has more initiative, and is altogether more efficient than he ever could be when unhappy.

Truly, it is said that a philosopher can rise above his clothing—but how many of us are philosophers? This sense of empathy raises a pleasant anticipation and a self assurance so necessary if we are to make successful contacts with other people. The problem of the first impression made by the applicant? In daily life the impression we make on those we meet reacts in turn on us, giving us further strength and initiative, or breaking down our self confidence and lowering our ability to produce.

At the same time clothes are affecting personalities in still another way. The dandy with a cane has caused his personality to extend clearly to the tip of the cane. Few men who wear high hats could deny that their personality filled the whole hat. The old fashioned bustle and crinoline must have made for many an enlarged and exaggerated personality. Superfluous wraps or thick, fuzzy coats are a certain badge of enlarged personality. In a similar way, baggy clothes make one feel as though he were in the graceful ends. A loose, draped costume gives a joyous sense of motion and will make many an awkward person more graceful. That is why the soft pliable silks are considered to be the ideal fabrics. The heavy silks that our grandmothers knew that could stand a stiff corset are not needed now. The soft, light silks, the flaxen, the linen, are the most psychological material, so to say, for at least feminine dress, not only for their own beauty and warmth, but for their extension of the activity of the imagination; and not only for those of the wearer, but of the observer as well.

The influence of a heavy corset is naturally just the opposite. A stiff corset may make one feel firm and self reliant and in that way strengthen, but more frequently it acts as a discouragement, lessening self confidence, initiative, and action.

Clothes often go farther than affecting personalities. They even lie for us at times. I have never forgotten one lie in clothing that I stumbled on while I was in high school. Our physical education instructor had a wonderfully well proportioned body. Directly and indirectly she was used to look that we perfect the proportions of our own bodies. One evening we stayed longer than usual for basketball practice, and in the course of a real, I took a notebook in the dressing room. I was half way home before I remembered it, and by the time I got back all the others were gone and only my note lay in the dressing room. On the bench lay her perfectly developed chest—a ruffled bosom. Tho this lie was intentional, all of them are not. Neat and spotless garments carry with them a thought of leisure time. Is that why the busy stenographer and the just as busy school girl like the immovable and fresh collars and cuffs? Is that why particular men wear white shirts a good part of the time?

(Continued on page 23)
The Psychology of Clothing

(Continued from page 11)

Not only do we all like our clothing to portray this imaginary leisure time, but we also want it to tell others that we can afford at least a few things that we do not need. Veblen says that people will often go ill clad in order to appear well dressed. He goes on to say, “It is true of dress in even a higher degree than of most other items of consumption, that people will undergo a very considerable degree of privation in the comforts of life in order to afford what is considered a decent amount of wasteful consumption.”

Veblen is also of the opinion that the high heel, the long tight skirt, the corset and the general disregard of women for comfort in their clothes is an evidence that women are still economically dependent on men. He then includes long hair in his list of evidences. Perhaps his reasons will all be out of date some day?

Psychologically good clothing, then, must create empathy. To do this, it needs not only to clothe the body properly, but also to clothe the personality and the set of individual actions that accompany the body and personality. In addition to these things, the really satisfactory costume is both fashionable and beautiful. On rare occasions it is not

NEW LACES AND TRIMMINGS

This store is well known for its well-selected assortments of fine laces; and we have even surpassed previous seasons. The variety offers the finest laces, as well as the less expensive ones.

You will be glad to send samples for your inspection.

YOUNKERS BROTHERS

Des Moines, Iowa.

Assurance!

that you can procure the newest and correct styles here at this store.

Just Now!

We are showing a complete display of

New Spring Hats
New Spring Suits
New Spring Dresses
New Spring Coats

WOLF'S

Des Moines, Iowa
possible to fully heed the call of fashion and have garments that are beautiful in line and color, but Frank Alvah Parsons sums up the situation adequately when he pleads with us to "Render unto fashion the things that are fashion's, and unto art the things that are art's."

Iowa State Women in Rural Schools
(Continued from page 12)

Rather, teachers must take an active part in the best social life of their young people, bringing to it the same genuine interest and enthusiasm that they might show among their friends at home. At the same time, they should observe faithfully the best social and moral standards of the community, being governed as to their personal conduct and even as to their companionships by these standards. And finally, if they show a desire to perform a helpful part in every possible way, regardless of how unpleasant or inconspicuous that part may be, they will have done much to insure that their great adventure will turn out well.

Tea Room Accounting
(Continued from page 14)

Recording all receipts, properly caring for them, and recording all issues, or consumed stores.

One real small tea room uses this system to good advantage. A daily tally sheet is kept on the wall near the door of the storeroom. On this sheet is placed all incoming stores provisions for the day, and goods taken out. The room is open only at stated hours, except in emergencies. The initials of the person receiving and taking goods are placed on this tally sheet and at the end of each day these tally sheets are transferred to the stores ledger cards.

When incoming records are counted, inspected and recorded, notice is served to employees and merchants that here is a place where affairs are handled in a business-like way. If it is not desired to separate provisions into perishables, and stores, the perishables may be recorded with stores, but in studies of food control it has been found practical and desirable to separate them.

ANNOUNCEMENT

of

Spring Footwear
and
HOSIERY

TRUEBLOOD'S
COLLEGE SHOE STORE
Campustown

Best Electric Co.
Everything Electrical
"THE HOME OF THE HOOVER"
130 Main St. Phone 123

"Say it With Flowers"
for
Easter Sunday
April 20th

F. J. Olsan & Sons
Phone 8

"CRANE'S"
STATIONERY
"Dress your thoughts as you would your person."

Student Supply Store
South of Campus