The urge to drown

Matthew Michael Loftin
Iowa State University

Follow this and additional works at: http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/rtd Part of the Creative Writing Commons, and the English Language and Literature Commons

Recommended Citation
http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/rtd/16106

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa State University Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Retrospective Theses and Dissertations by an authorized administrator of Iowa State University Digital Repository. For more information, please contact digirep@iastate.edu.
The urge to drown

by

Matthew Michael Loftin

A thesis submitted to the graduate faculty in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of
MASTER OF ARTS

Major: English (Creative Writing)
Major Professor: Sheryl St. Germain

Iowa State University
Ames, Iowa
2001

Copyright © Matt Loftin, 2001. All rights reserved.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Preface</td>
<td>v</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>My trampolinic earth</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Some of how it happened</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pretense of sleep and other things</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>During the flood</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Head South</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dream</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Painfully allow me to digress</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Remember this tryst</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Limbs</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Generic lament</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Green mind</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heavy yokes and what-have-you</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poem for poems</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>How to feel better about being left alone</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dream</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lit in the head</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Limbs</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dream</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Night out</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>All the liquor</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The boy breaks within the body</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Come on, die young</td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hope she's still lonely</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jackass</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>So I met this girl</td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Speechless, drifted, should have said</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Statues</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In the wake</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Limbs</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>She loves in mirrors</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hung with the purse</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dream</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Haunts my sleep</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Limbs</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>After failing to conceive</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Autophobia and murderous intentions</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Enough to kill a horse</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Title</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thinning over this</td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Coupling</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Limbs</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Congregation</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Pastor speaks</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Pastor prays</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Congregation</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Pastor speaks</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Congregation</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Pastor prays</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Congregation</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>
These poems are about intimacy, for the most part. A high school psychologist once told me that I needed to understand and appreciate intimate relationships in order to be happy. For some reason I always felt blocked from intimate situations; I always wondered about what the other person was thinking. I think that these poems show that stretch of imagination, although they recognize at the same time a human inability to fully understand the situation-at-hand.

While writing this manuscript, I came to the conclusion that the achievement of intimacy with another required a Zen-like participation in the moment. Simply put, if one does not think about the intimate moment, one will achieve intimacy within the moment. Quite a few of my poems explore points where intimacy is broken because of individual designs on the situation. Just about every character in these poems, including my various speakers, has an agenda that prevents them from achieving intimacy in the moment.

I have structured the manuscript in such a way as to provide a profile or model of my quest for intimacy. Intimacy became more for me than a relationship issue. I began to wonder about intimacy with myself. The Dream poems are an exploration of the Self, placed according to their import to the "waking" (non-dream) poems. Some of the poems attempt to portray a state of mind between fully-woken and dreaming. In order to show all sides of the profile, I feel that the inclusion of these states of mind is essential. Dreams, the waking world, and all parts between have equal import to an individual's emotional state of being. Jung has built an entire branch of psychology based on this assumption.

The "Limbs" series is not intended to function by itself as a whole. Without the context of their surrounding poems, the "Limbs" pages do not carry much independent meaning. I created the "Limbs" by pulling parts from poems that did not make it into this manuscript. They represent other thoughts on intimacy, both with Self and others. They are meant to provide bridges between sections of my book. The sections are not really sections, in the traditional sense. I did not want to interrupt the manuscript with blank, numbered pages. The pages that just read, "Limbs" are an attempt to provide a section break without completely dissolving continuity. Many of them are images or snippets that, without the surrounding poems, would lack contextual meaning. I derived the title "Limbs" from the secondary theme of self-dismemberment that runs through the work. As such, the word "Limbs" contributes to the work much more than, say, a large roman numeral on an otherwise blank page.

The final section, the Pastor-centered series, was originally meant to be a much larger. After writing the other poems for this manuscript, I felt that the Pastor series concerned itself with the same issue of intimacy, although in a religious context. It doesn't really belong with the other poems; placing it anywhere but the end would defeat the general mood of the work. It occupies the last space in my manuscript with the hope of providing a different context for reader reflection on intimacy.

I am strongly influenced by John Berryman's poetry. In The Dream Songs, his speaker Henry tends to move in and out of dreamlike conversations with himself in response to his waking reality. Berryman also manipulates syntax and verb tense in order to emphasize certain words or feelings in his poems. I imported this technique in quite a few of my poems. Arthur Rimbaud is another of my influences, although to less of a degree than Berryman. Rimbaud's flights of vision and dreams have been known to make me salivate. A final major literary influence on the work is Franz Kafka, although he is not known to have written poetry. Many of his shorter pieces, such as The Wish to be a Red Indian, affect my style with their employment of single images that fade into abstraction. Kafka defeats a concrete image by either immersing it in emotion or focusing on the absurdity of a single part of the image. This technique opens a piece to reader subjectification without fully revoking an understanding of the physical world.
"The fool looks in the lake, sees a fire of colors and drowns trying to pull the flowers from the water."

-Matt Crow, from "The locust"

"But never did Henry, as he thought he did, end anyone and hacks her body up and hide the pieces, where they may be found.
He knows: he went over everyone & nobody's missing.
Often he reckons, in the dawn, them up.
Nobody is ever missing."

-John Berryman, from Dream Song "29"
My trampolinic earth

This is the way I was strung but not tuned to play—this is the way my world ends, spilled over my feet.
My eyes are closed enough to star the light coming from the kitchen and a lover's voice renders distant verdicts in my ear. The earth bows beneath my trampled, telephone-holding body and I am shot up, my head bounced, screaming with a gunpowder whine to boom myself across the air and fade into a spider-shaped cloud of smoke.
All being equal and transmission-dependent,
I make plans to find some gasoline, soak myself, call back, and crackle my last minutes into a melting receiver.
Some of how it happened

We wound ourselves on the thinnest wire of what we shared, some moment in some afternoon when we saw ourselves reflected in each others' pupils. Some summer, we said when we were pleasantly high, wrapped in air conditioning, watching the contractions come in our eyes when the tree outside lifted grey from the window.

But was she pretty and I was later wronged, kicked out of place and somewhat withered from all the wind that escaped surrounding mouths. And yes, the air was heavy. And yes, I recall being bent by what she blew on my face. And yes, there was always her warm body to make the words slink off my back. I lived with her in my skin and I shot myself with stories of a way to stop breathing with her mouth so close to mine. I was afraid I would inhale her, that my lungs would shape her.
Pretense of sleep and other things

A fan half-filled the doorway, scattered papers on the floor slowly over night.

Your hands found them stacked neatly against the morning wall.
Your eyes crusted

in contrast to hers, she who woke when you rolled over and mumbled something about crowflies at six.

She never hurt for ways to lift herself over you in those darker hours.
You pretended that you did not feel her stares and caught yawns and she unfolded across you. With slow, plantlike precision, she put one foot on the bedrail and left warm sheets where she had been. You feigned that you were not awake enough to lie in the small draft created by her absence.

You listened to the sound of the fan, muffled slightly as she passed through the living room door to leave without waking.

During the flood

In an apartment by some trees, a filled-in swimming pool, an overflowing bayou, a patch of condemned buildings, and a rusted iron gate, we threw ourselves on each other and later pushed our faces against the plexiglass front window. We watched the rain cover everything. It made mud, smothered engines, and leaked in slowly underneath the air conditioner that broke every three months. The wet heat stood on our heads and shoved our cheeks together. I was never more dirty from her or the air and the sweat we smeared on each other might have been rain. It crept from the concrete banks of the bayou and patiently licked up the street until we knew the day was finished. After the sun set, the apartment darkened and we lit some candles. We soaked ourselves in wine, listened to the poured echoes in the rotting walls, and fell on each other some more.
Head South

Northern cornfields stretch my eyes yellow-gray clouds roll over themselves and spit.

Behind winter I see nothing; the sun disappears for more months than it shines and the leaf-green ground quickly decolors to crunch under snowboots.
I find no reason not to believe in the immortality of growing things—a long death and sleep before a short resurrection for harvest.

I am still not natural like the fields—
I die once to feed the cycle.
Perhaps my dirt will find some expectant mother who has not forgotten where her people go, who fills her mouth with me and screams, stuffed, back at the land and the life it hoards.

Dream

Friend gives me a framed sepia-toned picture of himself and someone I hate. They stand in loose jeans, hold each other. Cheap friend, cheap frame. Picture fell out. Another picture behind it. New picture—one I don't remember trying to forget. Person I hate with his lady on a car, dogwood blooms on the hood. Holds her hand like a new father. She was thinner then, not expecting, hadn't found me out of a crowd on a University park bench. Picture began to move, my eyes the camera sweeping toward their light couple conversation. They shift on the hood. She tosses her hair with expertise, plays with her belt buckle, smiles not for posterity but in the present. As if she didn't know I was there. Didn't know my name and face. Wind blew us both in a whirl of sound, sepia-tongued voices lifted me away from her, back to the body where I lay half-warm beneath sometimes-shared sheets, waiting for her to forget I said I was leaving.
Painfully allow me to digress

I know that some shape similar to mine haunted her head that night while I slept for three hours on the uncomfortable couch in that black Illinois town before I was to wake wild eyed and dry and throw myself over the rails of the train to a city of wind where I dragged my suitcase through piles of businessmen and beggars that were kind enough to point me in the direction of the tracks that led to the planes leaving for everywhere that I was obviously not going to since my ticket had the name of my home stamped boldly on its face that sat in a small paper envelope in my backpack along with the countless particles that made up my other belongings (two notebooks and some music) that I was taking to lay on the floor of my parents’ house as I rode with my head against plastic windows that fogged my reflection with my own sleeping exhalations and I still wonder if I was talking in my sleep as I often do when I am dreaming of her excursions into bars and her rides in cars to her rooms full of marines eager to show off their scars and purchase every drink so I had another drink on the airplane from the sarcastic stewardess who asked for the rest of my money while I listened to the music of Idaho and thought about where I was going to tell her that it was completely over you know kaput and how I was going to hold my drink while I leered across the table and screamed harlot whore slut bitch at her pretty hair while my eyes asked her to help me forget what had happened when I left town in a moving van full of everything we christened with our naked midnight fumblings to help me remember why the hell I still felt queasy and why I filled the toilet with bloody shit night after solitary night only to return home wanting to spend a few small moments in her presence but of course it didn’t go that way when I entered that bar with its clouds of piss-smell and let her sob on my leg before I exacted my body from her hysteries to leave the bar and get drunk for days but I digress Remember this tryst

Ghosts of each other, they lay on the couch collecting dust

in new afternoons.
Rays reflect on their faces before they slip on their shadow masks and laugh to each other.

They skin each other and lose the past in the cushions,

so much change.

Soaked in smoke,
emptied in their minds, they make silent

plans to find and haunt me, kill my sleep.
They will not get away with it.
Limbs
Limbs

1

We sit safe in houses.
Worlds live away through unseen eyes
and shuttered lids.
There are others that feel the same as you, others sputtering in smothered masks.

2

I consumed myself, beginning with the tendons from my elbow.
They gave me too much trouble and I ceased to love them a few summers previous. I looked at the place where my tricep ended.
I put some water on to boil and my vision filled with black steam; from the edges came a slow-spattered fuzz.

3

On my lips the red year bursts with a pulled dandelion scream and it occurs to me that I am tired of watching these bodies pile through the doors and days.

4

I am the ghost of Genghis Khan, shaking my invisible self on your living room floor, bending my legs in odd angles while I stand between your faces and the television. Tom Brokaw has nothing on my millions of scars and furrowed beard.
Generic lament

I tell myself that these times will eventually pass. I will be breathing beneath another sky or building.
But the muster builds from inside on this occasion when I consider my broken body and wish for a method to remove past days from my mind—a method that would somehow seal these minutes and hours in a box to be put far from feet, under my bed.
The days grow teeth and lumber into thick fog, collecting pieces as they go, stealing my senses, fixing the future with augmented frames and signposts. There will never be another way to think, a new filter of figment, a clear glass to lay in a clean pane.
I have watched the dust pile and pile on every stiffened friendship, each morning sun, every brushed yellow tooth, every car door I open, every jamb I pass beneath, every place I revisit in new clothes and faces.
I do not eat because I am not hungry for anything.
I would rather put flowers in my mouth and hold them like a doctor's wooden stick.
I would rather my breath around the petals and the stems than have it go bad like after a long night of sleeping. I would rather fall face forward into the next room with lilies spilling from my teeth and goldenrod crushed beneath my feet.
I would love to lean against the wall, close my eyes while I salivate the leaves and drool down my chin.
It is not that I am fasting or that I espouse some beautiful new diet; in fact I would prefer to remain anonymous with my flowers in my mouth.
Heaven yokes and what-have-you

A large, unfeathered hatchling, I wandered as smoke through the clucks and pecks on the parking lot, wearing my shorts and a t-shirt with a picture of the back of a shaved head on it.
The world was a runway and the people with whom I had been jogging were nowhere to be seen. My head was not shaved and my legs were somewhat skinny, bent the wrong way among gulls who poked their heads in stop motion toward me. The background stadium lifted up the sky and my gaze.
Cars passed, passed behind. I pushed stop on my portable player. Birds, cars with black eyes faded into outlined trees and I was filled with the God of morning twilight, red-eyed showers and coffee left steaming on the counter.
Worldless and of the air, nestless, I was fashioned of my own breath. A silver-tipped front, forecast by beheaded voices, rolled over the earth enough to shadow the top of the stadium. I shut my eyes in its wind, lifted my legs quicker, quicker through the mediated air and was swept through a flapping cloud, thrumming in the rushed escape of gulls. As the front quaked its clouds above me, I opened my eyes in a shadow of grey water. First drops fell on my head as the birds became dots and I remembered where I was previously headed.
Poem for poems

Perhaps if I were to write about pretty things and food and voluptuous words and incite pleasure like a riot of the mind. Perhaps if I were to talk about myself some more perhaps if I were to talk about time some more time and children and adults and life/death, consequential crap, etc. Perhaps if I were to walk the world with unbelievable insight and immeasurable breadth of vision. Perhaps if I were to stop this bleeding with more than two-ply toilet paper and put the knife away put the knife in a back pocket.
Perhaps if I were to decide that the knife was merely a reflection of my father or my mother or the evil genius of (insert demographic: race, class, gender, etc.). Perhaps if I was certain the world was kept spinning on a me string

Perhaps if I were the wind, moving in an empty body, mostly empty space, empty and swept over spaces with cleanliness in my wake, invisible water, and perhaps if I had currents from my lungs and these added to my breadth of vision (I would encompass, I would wrap myself around the planet, all).
Perhaps if I were to talk with an impressive command in my voice and so there would be no more of this perhaps crap. Perhaps if I were to sack and give myself away, full of nothing like a Poet Who-I-Can’t-Remember’s sacks of wind.
How to feel better about being left alone for my sentimental friends

How it started: my legs were going to leave me along with my favorite pair of shoes.
True story. Cut them off with a chainsaw, left the body grinning in the bathtub.
Didn't leave the head either—put it in a sack and went wandering.

Caught my Soul with a fishing pole, various naked meanderings about the coast of the Sea of Love. Used my bloody skull to do it with. The Soul can sniff blood in the water, like a shark, although it is composed of less cartilage and more air.

Held it up and thought about throwing it back.
Decided to fry it on the spot after pulling my head from its jaws. No better meal than a side of your own scalp with butter-sauced Soul. No, that's not really true.
Didn't eat my Soul

all at once, saved some of it in the freezer with pieces of my leg.
No, not true either. Fact is I'm not sure what happened the night I found the legs out. Went into what some fictionists call a blind rage. Found myself seated in a chair, in a room, staring at a nothing wall. Never felt worse. End passed me by.
Legs took leave. Expected more of me.
Dream

My two grandmothers were unearthed and set beside the kitchen table in the night. The air between them was morning and the sun lit their hair with orange. I began to sing. My body expanded with breath enough to near the walls. The bodies began to shake in a rising gale, my wind, my body now more than skin. I lifted shingles to the sky with my voice and tore clouds from the day's scrim. The bodies were caught in my cone, torn apart to scatter, sparks in the air. Grown to the heavens, I squinted in the sun. Mouth, breath all psalm. I was the rushing current bloodied in all things, a gale that swam in every lung.
Lit in the head

I woke from a nap and felt a year's dust rush from behind the box fan over my lips. I was rapt in the love of false mornings; the clock said seven and I didn't see that it was merely evening. The night had yet to pass and then I was awake with my feet on soft carpet and my eyes captured the light in the living room doorway. Some angel must have come while I was sleeping, some deitic hand had seized my burning mind with a carpenter's precision, pausing only to scratch my cat's ears before it mingled with heavy air and disappeared into walls. I walked through the lights and the air to the living room rug, where I fell crying with my hands in my beard, my knees on my shoulders.
Limbs
Limbs

5

The fields are organless and inside out, always yellow, waving in air at our foreheads when we pass in cars or when we climb ditch embankments to see them recede from the sky. The fields ruffle their own shadows and go gray in our approach.

6

Now I sleep with ghosts around me. They complain about their missing parts, some heads and hands, some ears and fingers. They wrap themselves in the walls and steal along my baseboard with whispered secrets about my personal hygiene habits. I wonder whether they get bored, what with my daily labors and my leagues of passing mourners.
There are enough of them to account for each of my visitors twice, one on each arm as they slip beneath the door jamb. They drape themselves, invisible silk on faces of friends.

7

When you plan to bury me, find train tracks, ignore signs, place me in a metal box and stomp on its lid until I am neatly wedged between the rails.
Dream

Through a familiar closet door and back into my old room I glide in the blue light that slips off painted walls.
Dusted air of toys and picture books of Presidents. Tossed sheets on the floor. Dreaming child with my name. Sleeps in waves and almost wakes when I near with raking limbs for arms, scaled violet skin,
hollow-cheeked grin, teeth. Fanning out and leaning over the shifting child, I slowly place my hands over his head to tighten, mask him in black twig fingers, exhale as he strikes at open air and collapses on the mattress.
Night out

Made himself a mirror in water on the table,
head in the periphery,
face silhouetted in the wet black.

Hands brushed his back, apparitions spread around damp napkins on the table. Reflections grew heads and lost them.

Drunken breath rained; hair dewed with desperation. Shadows devoured each other on the table. People rubbing people in the dark.

Wandered home alone, swam through his head. Woke red-eyed from the pools, hands on nothing but bed and an empty stomach.
All the liquor

It was as though I walked into fog with nothing on. My mother would have scolded me, bought me a sweater or something. All the faces, all the mouths, around me all the dreams and fictions slowly chiseled from air. Weren't supposed to find out—I hid the body where I wouldn't find it and vaporized myself in various directions.
No map. Not even a taxi. No address.

Followed me, though, stuck to space between my shoulderblades. I hid from it inside wombs and bottles and broken friends, hid because I wanted to, because I wanted to watch suicide and leave the body where it belonged. Some swatch of earth away.
The boy breaks within the body

Hands set fire to his mouth, his eyes.
His arms swing in blown flame, his skin crispy. A shell, he wanders in reflection, dead, dying, or pre-empted.
I laugh at him in car doors, half-guzzled glasses, puddles and pools, screens and screens and screens. He peels away easily now, a mild sunburn or skinned elbow presents no greater problem. His eyes watch me as he darkens slowly over night, every shift tears or pokes and fills our vision with static gray, every moment is engraved between us.
We separate somewhat smoothly, the tendons already cut, the only sound a soft ripping. He reminds me of worn velcro, all ground teeth and broken loops, empty-mouthed in his mimicry, almost muted as our shadows drip away and we are somehow free to wake in foreign lives.
Come on, die young

We were full of funnel cakes and fourteen years, she in striped tights and I in a band t-shirt. She followed me for several hours, always behind a column or trash can when I turned, always a few riders between us in line.
Would see her shoe disappear around a corner. Fleeting hair in the wind.

My friends thought she was looking at them, nudges and boy laughs in the arcade. And her friend was cute. We pushed each other into things, went into the theater, laid on the ground and yelled foul things amid fathers and daughters and mothers who pretended not to notice. We were large in our non-approach, we knew she was watching.

Found her sitting on the promenade, pretending to fiddle with a plastic glowflower, by herself in a firework night.
The day had long dripped from her body and her hair hid her eyes while I struggled to say something smooth. She saw my shoes and her back arched in a smile as she stood and slouched her hips toward me.

Remembered my name
and she told me hers as we left the park several minutes before closing. Was looking for a place to take her and she was still occupied with her hands. A bush looked good enough.
Pulled her behind it where we talked about music and our parents and where we went to school and then we kissed.

Gave her anything I could get off the ground on the short walk to where parents waited.
Climbed a tree and found my friends in the crowd made some introductions one friend talked to hers.

Of course I called her as soon as I got home and her father took the phone away. Always did.
Still found each other anyway, always at some gathering of youth, maybe the concert where I was dancing—her hand on my shoulder from a faceless mass—or when I sneaked her onto the floor at the local arena, or when I was atop a lightpole in a crowd between bands several years later—

She wandered up, stoned and grinning, and I slid from the metal into her arms, her hair, her eyes, the heat of the day and we flew from everyone to some bushes or hidden spot where we talked and laughed and touched and tongued and made plans for escape.
When I was old enough, we left a field extravaganza to the dismay of her friends and went to a cheap hotel where we drank and drank and made out in the shower.
Passed out to find her staring at me in the morning, smacking gum that she put in my mouth with hers.
We fumbled through each other before we parted, all smiles and promises to return to growing up apart, to spin ourselves in separate, little lives.
Hope she's still lonely

Newly sixteen, on the phone at three am with another one of the girls I gave my youth to.
Friend smiles next to his girlfriend on the bed. He found her at a drive-in, where she wore tight pants and was largely tipped by factory men coming home in the chemical air they created.

Drunk, wonderfully drunk, and this girl is telling me she won't take me back.
Still drinking, though, still talking while my friend reaches for another beer and balances the girl on a knee.

In the morning, he told me I took the phone inside the closet, dragging a twelve-pack, mumbling something about being better than a seventeen year old jackass with lots of pot and a fast car.
Told me I came out later with my arms aloft, happy to be taken back, and collapsed on the bed.
Called her when my head felt right, for three days of conversations before she flew from my voice into a clouded car door.
Jackass

Thought my cat was gone.
Turned around and saw no hide laying fur on parts of my apartment.
Thought I had gone with him, head didn't feel much the same and I was sitting empty on a bedsheets then a barstool with a runny mouth and plenty of ears pointed at me. Eyes were saying sorry when I told them. No cat. Sad. More whiskey.
Sometimes free. Waitress had a cat.
Wasn't the whole thing just horrible, we all agreed yeah and I was told not to dwell on it long. More to do than worry about jackass cat out in the snow making free with meows and scratching up the neighbors' porches. He'd be back where the food was. I didn't think so.
We were too much alike. He'd have stepped out in a blue rush of life, followed his whiskers off to break down the street and bust out from what he thought of that tiny place.
Hands everywhere, new food, some shiny tabby waiting for him behind the next mailbox.
Hoped he was happy now with his smiling owners and a big plush bed with some foreign name hung in gold banners all over the place. He'd be purring.
Wandered all over the neighborhood on the way home, calling for him, making tch-tch with my labored tongue.
Thought about when I got him from his mother.
Put him in a box in the car. Sang to him all the way home.
Didn't shut up with the crying. Probably missed those other warm cats. He was the runt. Stepped through the door, found him in the kitchen when I got home.
Twitched his tail all over my legs. Got a weird look on his face when I scooped him over my head and out into the parking lot. Lots of whooping, I showed him to the neighbors and everyone was pleased. Still don't know where he'd been hiding, some invisible cat place probably.
So I met this girl

& we are gorgeous and running together from ourselves with these night messages sometimes phone sometimes computer where I listen to jazz & make a model of contrivance in my jogging pants and Dexter Gordon look on my face at the monitor. There has never been a way to erase the thousand miles that sits between here & home like a gallon bucket of lead on my body. She is fall-over beautiful, her legs stretch for stories between my shoulders and feet. She prints my poems, carries them with her, says she reads them over again like murder & the way I read her letters over, over meals, the desk at work, the cat on my lap. Her letters say so, but there are arrows by her text & I know she deletes, adds here, there with the hand that grazed my skin so lightly only days ago before I left. Nothing better about her than her words (& her ) so carefully chosen, so fashioned, so flowed evenly into my head, my sleep & the days that lift their fog
& the space between my sheets.
Speechless, drifted, should have said

We sat in a car outside my parents' house with a couple of cigarettes and some empty bottles, talking about girls and music, things that were important. He said something I'd forget by morning, but I remember his delivery, punctuated with coughs and exaggerated pulls on the filter of what was left of his tobacco.

I was nodding off between the beats of the discs he slipped in the player and I caught snatches of some dream, mostly the soundtrack. I suppose it made us friends, my falling asleep in his car, his not caring, his continuance of the conversation. I didn't feel bad for not listening—these were the same things we'd chewed over every night and he knew what I would have said.

Sometimes I wish I was more present when we were talking like that—I always fell asleep at the wrong moments, usually in driveways or living room chairs.

Always languored outside the minute, leaning my head against something, I'd wonder where the birds went at night. Probably a telephone wire somewhere. They'd be raking their talons on the rubber casing, tensely twittering over the pulses of a thousand words per second.

Dreams of laughing with my grandmother while we were on the phone together; we'd lie and blame static on hordes of claws.
Statues

Met her through a friend—his girlfriend's friend. Never met a girl so delicious, full of drugs.
Had a red light in her room, Mother hated her on sight. Not my first lover, my first loved. Thought I was smitten before the act, buried in her voice. Was right—I was always bursting in her life, following my palms and dialing, dialing whatever number her voice lay at the end of. She waited for me by classroom doors and lockers, watched me across lunchroom tables.

Conspired to take her beneath the red light, friend helped me—convinced her friend to go along. We walked from school, they smoked. Made it to the door and the floor with some music playing over our heads. Friend changed the music and made two headed shadows on the wall.

She tasted like tar and cola as I mouthed her clean.
My hands never left my side—shook like chained dogs while we kissed and rubbed our foreheads together over hours.
Expected her to crawl away when I released my hands—Mother said girls were statues left in glass museums. Couldn't hold—she smiled, mumbled something about how slowly I moved, put her hand over mine on her chest. I prayed for days.

In the wake

There is something watching over stares that cover inches and something watching beneath her canopy of hair, something watching over sleeping manboys and womangirls together watching titans in the woodgrained walls.
There is a goddess between her legs and the rest of the world. There is a goddess between her and the sheets. There is a holy emptiness in the untouched air on the corners of the bed.

There are gods and goddesses of skin left prickling alive in the wake, drafts blown cold over glistening bodies.

Limbs
Limbs

8

Athena in the afternoon and Aphrodite at the apex of midnight, she 9

She flickered into shape outside my window, cold, wanting for less wind, looking starved for someone, although rays shot from her hand into the glass and I was old enough to know better. Old enough to slide across my bed and palm the windowpane, to watch her mouth slip sentences into breeze as though they could shatter and find my forgotten ears. I let my eyes roll across the floor and couldn't find my body.

10

I will compare it to a pet.
When I leave, it has two options:

11

Worlds are killing friends of mine and I am smothered as of late. The streetlights swell for all of us, we falter in the slightest light harshened in starred eyes. Buildings control the sky, always falling and we crouch and crouch and cover our heads and our ears and our eyes and wait to feel the world on our backs, finally a promised weight and rotted breath.
When it comes, we are surprised and we shout to ourselves and we drink and we drink and we take some pills and we talk to professionals and we shudder and we strain to wrap our heads around it.
She loves in mirrors

Had been privy to her since my own adult inception, her acolyte, invented newly with the passings of her frequent head
before the windowpane.
Would swallow
my voice and fall into her with room and mind to spare.
She was darker—fevers rained from her pupils, rolled from the tips of her hanging hair to catch circles of my neck..
Stroked her curved surfaces and felt the pulse in my own fingers, a satisfaction of smothered wants and passages driven in less energetic throwings at her. Here was blood, the body, fountain and idol
I couldn't spirit my face from.
Hung with the purse

Smiling as they found each other, fast-wrapped in a hug.
They met too quickly. My foot slipped on its way around them. I found myself holding her purse and his drink again, holding them a little too long. Sweating leather strap in my left and melting liquor in my right while they exchanged more than pleasantries. Before she released and whirled for her bag, he whispered something to her. Air between them winked.

Drove her to my apartment, let her cradle my wrists while she upbraided my stupidity for making such an accusation.
She had chosen only me and felt cheapened when I brought it up, we were to be married, after all. Friends wouldn't do that to their friends he said sometimes when it was he and I drinking.
Shoulder bruised from claps on the back in the wake of another ordered round. I knew there were times when I came home to an unhooked phone and his name on her dreaming lips.

Always their extra second for arms on each other. Always his drunken pledges to take her on a friendly date after I left town. Just to keep her faithful he would say and then wink at one of us. Impossible to tell which—she stood too close to me and I was hung with the purse anyway.
Dream

She disturbs the curtains in the living room. Hear her from the kitchen while I trace grooves in the table with my little finger.
Sounds leave her mouth to linger under the doorway before they slide off the side of my head, thin balloons.
Says something about a neighbor, a good neighbor, neighbor with a nice garden and a hat.

Walls become brick and I am outside, watching a gate swing open. Backyard sparkles with green and spotted yellow.
Hatted man by the back fence reaches into a plastic pot on the porch, greets me by waving at his garden of weeds planted in shapes of letters.

Calls me closer to shove me at the garden, drops dust over my head. Yard shoots up, loud colors. Body shrinks to a stem, my feet fall into earth.
Casting cut shadows on clipped grass, my leaves shine, spiny curls in bright sun.
Haunts my sleep

heavy days spent waiting for those moments with her to fall over into something what

{not valium, what it ends in always}

heavy days spent pretending to be unconcerned, with two eyes directed at the walls, following the usual printings on the wall

{not valium, what she always wanted)—should have never ended (baby) above her legs,

all those mornings heaved to the side with fluid motions her lips and hips were a mountain by the toilet impossible to shower in those conditions, nervous complaint, nervous condition

{valium, what with trying to forget it all, you know}emptywombed, she would shoot herself up with men in various rented rooms to varieties of music and decorate those scenes with her frantic timing and murmured complaints about the conditions

{always the conditions, nervous, what, valium spilled from a tilted hand that held the bottle}
Limbs
Limbs

12

The shielded shards of our replacements decorate the pedestals and the floor in our wake, our slithered burst of wind and airy arms that met them with the fever of an orgasmic god.

13

Knife in the hand.
Blood in the head.
Blood in the head.

14

Delivering the last shot to her head, I coughed and found blood in my fist before the sidewalk lurched to meet my face. Feathers in my ears, all over the pavement —black, striped, curling through my fingers. I was no better than a body laid tangled on another and the curb.
She was blown through, a thousand torn mouths in a bedsheet.

15

I am quickly covered in livers, and I smile while I wipe the bile and blood from my eyes. I am happy in an organic sense, if you will forgive the pun.
I am prone upon a bed of flowering stomachs and watching you with the most seductive of gazes, although I mean nothing by it. I am fortunately one of the undead, fortunately one of the wedded casualties and I need to feel I could breathe clearly without these muscles and nervous systems slung over my arms, wrapped around my legs, trestled on my head.
After failing to conceive

She falls down stairs in my dreams, kicks her face with one high heel. Blood smokes the carpet.
Her hands hold red stems and quiver.

She lies in twisted little things, pieces of her hair. Threads of her dress curl like baby spiders on their backs.

Lying next to her glass eyes,
I watch her red mouth bubble and form muted questions in the short space between us.
Autophobia and murderous intentions

I am better at killing with my right hand than what this document might have to say:
you never listen to the left hand; it talks to the right when you are sleeping and sends nothing but gloved silence beneath the sleeves of your coated conscience in the piles of fresh snow or blood [it really doesn’t matter which, I heard my thumb whispering in my ear last night — it thinks it can affect my dreams by asking simple questions and making several statements about the meaning(s) of life, the blind leading the blind across miles of parqueted floors, a blade that pathetically drives itself into the wall as it passes from palm to palm with fingertipped precision, and much much sweat left inside the gloves to mingle with those few drops and drips of what (you wake much too soon, always with the hands clutching pillows or perhaps your nervous legs which do nothing to point out the culprit, the enemies of the mind, those fingered companions that take slow liberties with the physical objects in your apartment and remove themselves only to flicker the light switch, most likely grinning at each other in your ignorance, they have more than half-lives they will say when your eyes are closed and other portions of your brain have taken it upon themselves to run the riggings of supposed light and sound and parades of subliminal stimulation, festivals with crowds of faces that you yourself might have followed in other times, lives, ways, and implicit dissentions that seem completely out of grasp only because the ten-fingers will not take it upon themselves to fight without your supposed permission; they cower from cigar clippers and mallets that I have threatened them with what purpose other than regaining some semblance of control, some shading of order and a general eschewing of dust from every shelf in my apartment, things shall not get so dirty and red from their armed escapades in the softer hours of the stars I always tell them when I am scrubbing and the sun appears on my sallowness through the kitchen window and I squint at my hands, my pale, specked hands, their bloodlust can but will not leave my dreams any more I said in unison with my reflection as I stepped from the red shower with no other intention than that of having them removed by a professional]}— such are my nights and days, and I caution all owners of benign hands to take care in the presences of palmists—they’re in it together.
Enough to kill a horse

Doubled over her face,
I could almost hear her scream when the fluid in the motion caught up with my maker arm.
The ceiling corners held my eyes and my jaw went slack in some purple off the mattress.
I thought she was left smiling closer to her ears, her mouth cut too many times through the unlit space between us.
Felt her breath in the field as I buried her body of humid years passed in the space between boy and what I thought was something new.
Hair fell off itself and flickered against my scalp in the breeze. Hands left the shovel in the ground and my foot sagged on its ridge.
Smelled the ghost of her cigarette and her chocolate tongue around me. Kept digging beside the body, kicked it—good measure. Felt her yawn and swallow in my brain as I rolled her over the edge,
covered her,
and tried to leave.
Coupling

The short span after dark, we wait for our bodies to turn to stone in the sun-caked mud with our arms around us. Run our tongues over the ravines in our foreheads, taste salt, and our fingers stick briefly in our hair. Already learned to lick our eyelids into shape and gain another day. Already learned to touch slowly so there will only be light bruises. Drain our heads with some idle conversation about the dirt, the dark around.

Nothing has changed
in the earth above, cracked and blown over.
Hair seems to grow—it is our skulls that shrink, our bodies that turn in the stale air. There are times, however, when we shiver off our shoulders, stand out of our legs and climb those several feet to give ourselves to wind—we crumple and join above the dirt.
Limbs
Limbs

16

You smell like rickets and I can't wrap myself around myself or you. I can't breathe, being wind and stretched over the abscesses of the days spent fumbling in the corner with your memory hanging over my head. I am still moving the refugees of trash on the floor in snakelike patterns and wondering where I left my body, where I left my head, where this room was left by, where I left and lied about it, where I turned inside out to find the space I was full of.

17

Dust sits on the blinds.
They have not been recracked for a year. They were left in a half-lurch, an angle pointed at the ground that shatters sunrays on the old carpet and my feet.
I have left fingerprints in the dust however, when I watched the students walk to school, or when I watched the trash people pick up the trash.
I have worn the same blue bathrobe for fifty showers, and I only shower when I have slept longer than a few hours at a time.

18

I come with a face full of black teeth on some lanky doorstep.
I come with a hand full of rotten posies that pressed my skin to tear.
I come with a head full of malformed babies, of glass stuck bleeding in clots of hair, of love split down my repetitive spine.
I come with no one else.
Congregation

We are happy to allow your entrance and swirl your face with ours—we are not worried about your story or your center. We will find a center in you.

If you leave, no other will take your place. You are part of our community. The chair will stay empty but your spirit will stay behind.

Should you need it again, return to us and we will remind you how you became a piece of us, how you never left at all.
The Pastor speaks

They look so pretty on their knees before the body transfigured, flesh made brilliant in stained glass rays.
They shear themselves of sin with bent heads, closed eyes, folded hands, cramped knees squirming on the narrow, carpeted rails. I am still feeding them of the body, although I help no one lift the cup. I can’t.
They would leave with blood on their doilied chests, crumpling their hats in the tight sweat of their hands. I should not want to create a scene. I should not want to take up the crook again. I should not want to want them to want the body like this, not the body falling from my hands, not the broken body.
The Pastor prays

Lord, it is not that I drink too much. Lord, the drinks cost too much and don't stay full.
Lord, my shoes have worn themselves away in your mud and snow, have molded my feet into scythes that stumble in and out of bright mornings in the bathroom with my arms making bent crosses on my belly.
Lord, it is that I do not drink enough of your fine grain whiskey, it is that I do not get enough of your shaping hands.
I know I do not get enough because I know that you are still thinning my drinks as I ask for more. Lord, it is hard to accept direction when I am not soaked in charcoal mellowed bourbon; I stare myself sober by paging through those memories you were so thoughtful to endow me with.
Congregation

Our Sundays are slow—we squirm beneath him for an hour or two and spill into the narthex to talk about our people. We are proud of our church families that only spread beneath his thumb.

He would have our lives written between lines of the good book. Our faith is a force in the community, our young people are strong and athletic.

They do not wear dark clothing, too much make-up. They do not worship Satans, drink, smoke, sex. Surely they will carry us to the new age.

The end demands that we coach them—we want them next to us when we are dead.
The Pastor speaks

"The Lord bless you and keep you,
The Lord make his face to shine upon you and give you peace." They are through shifting in their seats and fumbling with their white bags. Picking up their feet and filing out the door, they are not slow to make their Sundays. Barbeques, lawn mowing, football, gossip in the narthex or over the phone. In my car, I have a brand new bottle and no one to share it with. The church secretaries would, I think—they smile behind plastic flowers. My Sundays are far from slow, I drive to a bar in another town and wait for God to coalesce in the bottom of my glass.
We watch him die
a less magnificent death—no scarlet thunder calling, no wonderful suicides to see in the neighborhood.
We watch him die
in the crevice of his own mind, planted in broken days he expected to arrive.
He should float off in a burning casket, with all of us watching from our homes and windowpanes. Nothing is gained from his slow death by bourbon.
Wish we could forgive him the drink, all being ash.

He defends himself, says secrets to his shrink about watching his reflection crack, something about his eyes and our herding gaze.
The Pastor prays

Give me no sleepless nights and a stomach that stays down. Send me reeling in a fortunate fiction of love. Torture me no more. Let me see the full length of the mirror.
Wash me in unbottled holies and more than temporary solace. Grant me these things before I break, Lord.
Sirens sing from alleyways, voices call nightly to drag me into windowless places and lay me next to walls.
I shake in forests of glass and labels when I wake, my hands stutter
and tear your pages.
Congregation

His red eyes crack as he invokes the Host and flails behind the pulpit over Hell, brimstone rains, cities left in desert. Says the Rapture is a fire to be coughed from the mind with prayers and sips from the bloody cup.

Feeling charred, we sit, holding hymnals, paging though the program. The end must be near, the end is an unbroken promise.

No one finds those golden streets without repenting beneath his shaking stares and fingers. We promise to be good, please we promise.