The Two Of You

Abstract

Your quiet eyes are seeing a long way. Something you know tingles the back of your neck Then surges up into your head again, And out of your eyes first, then covered with words It goes to meet her same knowledge halfway. Outside, rain sinks the ground into the ground, The night is looking in through every window...
The Two Of You

By Alan Christy

English, Junior

Your quiet eyes are seeing a long way.
Something you know tingles the back of your neck
Then surges up into your head again,
And out of your eyes first, then covered with words
It goes to meet her same knowledge halfway.
Outside, rain sinks the ground into the ground,
The night is looking in through every window.
You speak to her of angled space as you paint,
She uses your brush to add squares of sunshine.
Time's arms have lifted you both up and dropped you,
You will float down together into morning.
