Demerol Trips

Paul Blakely*

*Iowa State University

Copyright ©1982 by the authors. Sketch is produced by The Berkeley Electronic Press (bepress). http://lib.dr.iastate.edu/sketch Demerol Trips

Paul Blakely

Abstract

The ceiling hangs so close I could touch it with my hand. The bed drifts toward the northwest. The ceiling floats along, an unsteady canopy. Dulled pain gathers all my awareness and lays it on the pit of my stomach like a rock. I open my eyes...
Demerol Trips

by Paul Blakely, English Grad Special

The ceiling hangs so close I could touch it with my hand The bed drifts toward the northwest the ceiling floats along, an unsteady canopy  Dulled pain gathers all my awareness and lays it on the pit of my stomach like a rock  I open my eyes to see the curtain separating me from the man in the next bed a goose-necked urinal standing indecently somewhere above my feet a pink-bowed plant that reminds me of death  Eventually it is night I think I am not sleeping because there are voices and footsteps but my bed seems deep within its guard rails like a baby's crib A nurse wonders whether I want another hypo I cannot tell . . .

The bed surrounds me like a little room I stretch suspended between its ends like a lampstand in a lathe Something hums like a motor near my head It picks up speed and I whirl and turn and spin and whirl The stiff medicinal mattress rises against my back, and from the hallway a light shines through an open door very far away