Student-Faculty News
Dr. Rodney H. Ingraham, Assistant Professor of Veterinary Physiology and Pharmacology, left the department on Feb. 1 to take a position at Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Dr. Ingraham received his B. S. (1950) and D.V.M. (1952) from California and his M.S. (1968) from Iowa State. Prior to coming to Iowa State Dr. Ingraham conducted research in Hawaii and Mexico on heat stress as related to reproduction and milk production in the bovine. He joined the physiology department in March, 1966, and has taught courses in "Comparative Mammalian Physiology" for sophomore veterinary students and "Physiology of Domestic Animals" for agriculture and animal science majors. While at ISU he has conducted preliminary research at NADL on the thermal environment of the ovary in the bovine.

At L.S.U. Dr. Ingraham will continue with his teaching and hopes to continue his research in heat stress when facilities are completed. The first classes at the new veterinary school at L.S.U. began January 1 and the freshman class will finish their first year's studies in August. Classes will then resume in the fall for the second year. Dr. Ingraham speculated that he may be involved in some new teaching methods including a possible team teaching situation combining anatomy and physiology beginning in April.

Dr. Ingraham cited the challenge of a new school and new opportunities as a part of his decision to leave Iowa State. As Louisiana provides a better environmental site for heat stress studies than does Iowa he also hopes to devote more time to the research he is interested in.

We regret to see Dr. Ingraham leave Iowa State but we wish him the best of luck as he accepts new challenges at L.S.U.

Dr. Delbert L. Harris, Assistant Professor of Veterinary Microbiology and Preventive Medicine, has received a $5,000 award from the Merck Co. Foundation for the development of autotutorial methods of instruction in veterinary pathogenic bacteriology. Congratulations Dr. Harris!
