If this life were written with another pen, you would be a blues artist whose albums would clutter my floor as I soak up your gospel whenever I got down;
or you would be a famous author, whose stories read me like an open letter and told the secrets I struggle to discover on my own;
or you would be a teacher, lecturing my class on the past and future of our heritage, the strength we were derived from and the strength we’ll need to move on;
or you would be my favorite revolutionary, your name chipped and set in stone as a pathway to the legacy that is yet to be known;
or you would be a legendary filmmaker, casting the freedom rides and Panther marches of your time in a flickering display, revealing to our native land its pride and shame;
or you would be a preacher, leading your flock to the sea and looking over us protectively, even me.
Instead you are just my father.
